them in horror and shouled to them to go over the roof to an adjoining house.

But fear had bereft them of their senses, and they refused to move.

Policeman Martin Conley, of the Oak street station was among the reserves that were rushed to the scene of the fire. He fought his way through the crowd in the street and got a long ladder which he ran up to the third story. There it reached a fire escape balcony and the women and children mustered up courage, after a time, to climb down it to safety. The ladder would only accommodate a few at a time and it seemed as if many of them could not reach the ground before flames belching from the windows would cut off their escape.
